III, Bul. 11, WD, 1942), the following unit is cited under the provisions of AR 260-15 in the name of the President of the United States as public evidence of deserved honor and distinction. The citation reads as follows:

The 16th Reconnaissance Squadron (Heavy) Special is cited for outstanding performance of duty in action against the enemy in the Mediterranean area from 1 October 1943 to 31 January 1944. Assigned the difficult and extremely dangerous task of cracking open the Axis radar defenses of "Festung Europa," the unit engaged in sustained operations against the west coast of Italy from Salerno to the coast of southern France in an uninterrupted series of single, unescorted night investigational missions in which each and every aircraft of the squadron participated. Departing home base in Africa at dusk, the aircraft of the 16th Reconnaissance Squadron (Heavy) Special took off on 1,200-mile missions, often in the face of formidable weather which grounded other units, flew across the Mediterranean, and proceeded to investigate predetermined areas. Descending to altitudes as low as 200 feet despite the fact that the B-17F type aircraft was designed for high-altitude operations, the crews purposely attempted to alert and excite enemy radar, exposing themselves to intense radar-controlled antiaircraft fire of all caliber, as well as the small-arms fire which was extremely effective at the dangerously low altitudes required for the investigation. Harassed by enemy night fighters, constantly on the alert for abrupt changes in terrain over hostile and unfamiliar territory, and exposed to the possibility of ramming barrage balloons anchored in the harbor areas, the crews of the aircraft were hard-pressed under this psychological strain to obtain the top priority information on enemy radar strength. Of particular value to Allied intelligence in planning the amphibious part of the Anzio invasion was the information gained from 21 highly hazardous missions devoted to probing the strength, multiplicity, and tactics of the Axis radar defenses in and around the Anzio beachhead, both prior to and during the actual invasion. In the complete darkness of moonless nights and with inadequate navigational aids, the coastal strip which contained the beachhead was unerringly covered. Skill and alertness averted certain disaster from the jagged cliffs which characterized the precipitous terrain north and south of Anzio Point. During this action, the 16th Reconnaissance Squadron (Heavy) Special sustained 50 percent combat casualties. The squadron located over 300 enemy radar stations and was instrumental in the destruction of over 65 enemy ground electronic installations. The skill and efficiency of the ground crews materially aided the accomplishment of these missions. The outstanding heroism and devotion to duty displayed by the officers and enlisted men of the 16th Reconnaissance Squadron (Heavy) Special are in keeping with the highest traditions of the armed forces of the United States.
