is commended for meritorious conduct in the performance of hazardous service from July to September 1940. Organized under the direction of the War Department at a strength of 2 officers and 46 enlisted men from selected volunteers of the 29th Infantry Regiment, it pioneered experimentation to determine the feasibility of employing paratroopers in modern warfare. Long and laborious application to dangerous assignments was necessary to carry out the tactical experiments. Beginning with parachute jumps from low altitudes, the tests went on to mass jumps on 22 August and the first successful platoon jump involving a tactical problem on 29 August. Although several men were injured, the steadfastness and loyalty of purpose of every rank never faltered. The intricate problems of parachute technique were solved, special parachute equipment was designed, test-jumped, and refined, and the organization and minor tactics of parachute infantry were established. Highly successful airborne operations in all theaters of operations throughout the war attest to the achievements of the Test Platoon. (This award supersedes the Commendation awarded these officers and enlisted men, as announced in Section V, General Orders No. 89, War Department, Washington 25, DC, 19 October 1945).
